values. In this way students are engaged in discovering the underlying values embodied in the structure and functioning of contemporary international institutions. Criterion 3: Students participate in assignments and activities that require them to consider...how their own and/or others' attitudes, convictions and actions are influenced, consciously or unconsciously, by the institutions studied. Through short-writing assignments, discussion questions, essay exams, and the final research paper, students are urged to consider the values behind American diplomatic stands on various environmental policy issues and the bases for these values. In doing so, they come to reassess their own convictions on American policy positions.
